Inverted Triangle/General to Specific - An Overdosed Society

For people of a certain age in the United States, experimenting with drugs centered around the years in which they came of age. People who grew up in the 1960s were part of a generation that found itself in the middle of more and more personal freedom and lifestyle choices. Drugs boomed in popularity. They were to the counterculture movement what oxygen is to mammals. Suddenly, psychotropic villains like LSD were everywhere. Smoking marijuana became fashionably cool. In the long run, however, something went terribly wrong. The explosion of drug addiction began showing its hideous face, leaving in its wake disastrous consequences for those generations. Today, fentanyl is the new American nightmare being peddled on the streets. Slowly, we are losing another generation to drug addiction in the United States. A top priority of city and state governments across America should be to eliminate fentanyl overdoses.

Question Based/Interrogative Introduction - A Shelter or a Torture Chamber

Is it even a mystery why puppies are some of the most lovable companions in the world? There are few things humans value more than a loyal companion that is also a furball of cuteness. Puppies offer love unconditionally and grow up to be part of our families. In return, they ask for little more than a meal or two and a nice, safe place to call home. The most amazing part is that for a few, short months they will be miniature versions of their future selves. In a recent trend, many Americans are turning to puppy mills to source their pets. Unfortunately, puppy mills mate females at every turn without considering their health and well-being. As a result, malnutrition, reproductive problems, and genetic disorders affect litters of puppies at astonishing rates. Additionally, dogs in puppy mills experience socialization trauma and lack human interaction, which leads to behavioral problems such as fear, aggression, and anxiety. Puppy mills across America should be outlawed for their capacity to perpetuate animal cruelty.

Narrative Introduction - The Future is Now

The year is 2067. Multiple animals have gone extinct. Raccoons, beavers, and skunks are among hundreds of California native species that can only be seen in museums or through old footage from over 40 years ago. Everyone has migrated to other states with only a small population left in Northern California. The state is completely dry, a desolate, barren landscape, especially the Central Valley, where the agriculture industry was once known as the breadbasket to the world. Our harsh reality didn't happen overnight. It started with decade after decade of water resource mismanagement. What was once the California Dream now only exists in memory - and it is spreading inland. On what is left of arable land in the United States, it's time to enforce tight water restrictions and impose prison sentences for those who violate the law.
